The purpose of this study is to outline the differentiation of success of drafting and developing Professional Hockey Players amongst the three Major Junior Leagues (WHL, OHL, QMJHL) in the CHL. It analyzes three development leagues that help contribute to the Major Junior Rosters; The Alberta Midget Hockey League (AMHL), The Greater Toronto Minor Midget Hockey League (GTMMHL), and The Quebec Midget AAA Hockey league (QMAAA). The three Major Junior leagues select players for their teams via a drafting process. When players hit a certain age, they become eligible to be drafted, and teams select the players they believe are the best available to come play for their team. The OHL and the QMJHL draft their players after their 15-year-old season and are eligible to play for their respective clubs in their upcoming 16-year-old season. The Western Hockey league drafts players after their 14-year-old season but players cannot play for their teams until their 16-year-old season as well. Data was collected from the development leagues (AMHL, GTMMHL, QMAAA) over a 5-year period analyzing players selected in the 3 Major Junior drafts and determining if they: played in the CHL, were drafted to the NHL, played Professional Hockey, and if they played until the age of 20. Then an analysis of burnout and early sport specialization is conducted to investigate factors that could cause an effect in a player's development. The data shows that players selected in the OHL and QMJHL Drafts are significantly more likely to play Professional Hockey opposed to players selected in the WHL Draft. The analysis of burnout and early sport specialization finds that the WHL drafting players after their 14-year-old season may be placing them in age inappropriate environments that could harm their participation and development in hockey. This study concludes that the OHL and QMJHL drafting method of selecting players after their 15-year-old season plays a significant role in producing Professional Hockey Players opposed to the WHL's drafting method of selecting players after their 14-year-old season.

1 Introduction

At the end of each hockey season hundreds of teenage hockey players hear their names called in one of the three Canadian Hockey League (CHL) drafts; 782 players were drafted in 2016 (eliteprospects) (not including the CHL Import Draft). The three leagues that together make up the CHL are the: Western Hockey League (WHL), Ontario Hockey League (OHL), and the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League (QMJHL). The teams in these leagues put in a lot of time and resources each year into making sure they are selecting the best possible players in these drafts. It is believed by many that teams who successfully draft the best players over the long term are putting themselves in the best position to succeed. “The successful identification of talent and the ability to build a solid foundation of players are essential in developing winning athletic programs (Gee, Marshall, & King, 2010). Each league has a different region from which to draft, but also different drafting rules. They are as follows:

WHL:

- “The bantam draft allows for the orderly transfer of players to WHL Protected Player Lists (PPL) from the bantam ranks (14 year-olds)” (whl.ca).
- “Teams can select eligible players from British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Northwest Territories, Yukon, Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho, Kansas, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.” (onemillionskates.com)

OHL:

- For the 2018 OHL Draft: “...players born in 2002 and non-overage players that were not carded with an Ontario based midget AAA team from protected OHL territories are eligible for selection in the 15 rounds of the 2018 OHL Priority Selection” (15-year-olds). (OHL Priority Selection Information guide)
- “Teams can draft players from Ontario, as well as from the U.S. states Michigan, Pennsylvania and New York, and a few other designated U.S. states east of the Mississippi River.” (onemillionskates.com)

QMJHL:

- For the 2018 QMJHL Draft: 2002 players were eligible to be drafted (15-year-olds).
- “In the QMJHL, draftees come from Quebec, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, as well as the U.S. region of New England, which includes Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire and Rhode Island.” (onemillionskates.com)

The key difference in the drafting rules between leagues (besides geographical regions) is the age of the players each league is drafting. In the OHL and QMJHL they are drafting players after their 15-year-old seasons. CHL players are eligible to start playing in the league at 16 years old so these players are getting drafted in the spring, and then starting the season that fall with their teams. In the WHL they are drafting their players a whole developmental season earlier at the age of 14. These players still need to wait until they are 16 years old to play full time in the league, so the season after they are drafted, they are still going to play Midget level hockey.

It is believed going into the study that the OHL's and QMJHL's draft method of selecting players after their 15-year-old season is more successful for developing CHL and NHL players than the WHL's method of selecting players after their 14-year-old season. The aim of this study is to determine if there is a difference in: teams successfully building their rosters with drafted players, percentage of CHL drafted players playing in the CHL, and the amount of the sample size going on to play in the National Hockey League (NHL). The research could be valuable to see if there is a gap between the rates at which each league is successfully developing their players to move on to the next level. But to also look into different factors playing into a player's development such as: predicting a player's future success, early sport specialization, and athlete burnout. The factors being examined to predict future player success are: round selected in the drafts, height/weight biases, and age biases. Early sport specialization is when young athletes start to train and focus solely on one sport too early. And finally, burnout is the instance when a young athlete retires from sport all together from being over exerted early in their careers. The athletes researched in the sample set are from 3 minor hockey development leagues that feed heavily into the 3 CHL leagues. The Alberta Midget Hockey league (AMHL) which feeds heavily into the WHL, the Greater Toronto Minor Midget Hockey League (GTMMHL) which feeds heavily into the (OHL), and the Quebec Midget AAA Hockey League (QMAAA) which feeds heavily into the QMJHL. The differences in leagues and the criteria for players from each league to qualify for the study are as follows:

AMHL:

- The AMHL is a Midget AAA league for 15, 16, and 17-year-old players.
- Players born between 1991 and 1995 who played in the AMHL as a 15-year-old were selected for the study.

GTMMHL:

- The GTMMHL is a Minor-Midget AAA league for 15-year-old players.
- Players born between 1991 and 1995 who played in the GTMMHL and were drafted in the OHL priority draft were selected for the study.

QMAAA:

- The QMAAA is a Midget AAA league for 15, 16, and 17-year-old players.
- Players born between 1991 and 1995 who played in the QMAAA as a 15-year-old and were drafted into the QMJHL were selected for the study.

The first step in building the criteria to decide which players to include was to first try to make it as even as possible. 15 years old was determined to be the age that each player would start to be tracked at, 1 full season before they were eligible to play major junior. Each league was selected as they were determined to be large enough development leagues for the CHL and gave a large enough sample size to get significant results over the 5-year period.

2 Drafting Processes in Sport

In sports the act of drafting is defined as “a system whereby exclusive rights to selected new players are [divided amongst] ...teams” (Merriam-Webster). Many sports leagues in North American and around the world hold a draft including: NHL, NFL, NBA, MLB, and KHL.

In the NHL the first draft was held on June 5th, 1963 in the Queen Elizabeth Hotel in Montreal. The original thought behind holding a draft was to eliminate the system of NHL teams sponsoring amateur teams and its players, and to create a system that would give each team equal opportunity to acquire star players (NHL Draft History). In today’s NHL the Entry draft is 7 rounds long, each of the 31 teams gets 7 picks each. Teams also have the option to trade their draft picks for current players or future draft picks so in some drafts they may have more or less than 7 picks. This results in 217 players being drafted every year from around the world (eliteprospects).

Drafting rules differ from league to league, and sport to sport. In the NHL all players that will be 18 on or before September 15th in the year of such entry draft can become eligible to be drafted by delivering a written notice to the League office (known as an opt in form) before May 1st or 7 days after that players team has finished playing (NHL Hockey Operations Guidelines). To contrast in the NFL, a player must have been out of high school for at least 3 years before they can request the leagues approval to enter the draft (NFL Football Operations).

The practice of having a draft has made its way down to the Major Junior Level as a method for team to get exclusive rights to prospective players. Teams put a heavy emphasis on scouting these young players to ensure they make the correct picks when draft day comes.

3 Predicting Hockey Success

There has been a substantial amount of research done within the sporting world regarding the process of drafting. The majority of research done on drafts in sport is primarily focused on the world of professional sports in leagues such as the NHL, NFL, NBA, and MLB. The purpose of researching the science of drafting in the sporting world is essential for the success of the teams that partake. It is important for teams to improve their understanding of the factors that go into a successful draft, as well as the factors that affect athletes individually. Narrowing the scope to look at only Junior Hockey Drafts, the amount of research shrinks significantly. One research paper specifically “explored relations between player size, birth date and selection order in the WHL and OHL drafts and whether or not selection order predicted future success as a hockey player.” Atkins (2015.) The findings in Atkins paper provided both valuable information, and took a further look into some of the similar topics researched in the present study. Atkins confirmed in his study that players drafted earlier are more likely to achieve a higher level of hockey throughout their careers, and also that players from Ontario drafted to the OHL are more likely to reach a higher level of hockey than those drafted to the WHL. “Which may in part be a result of the later draft, compared to the WHL” Atkins (2015.)

One of the assumptions that plays a big role in Atkins study, is the job of scouting. “Scouting, identifying, and predicting talent are difficult tasks even for the most seasoned scouts who operate in sophisticated talent identification systems.” (Atkins 2015, 3.) While scouting can be difficult, the historical data taken from the NHL draft looking specifically at draft pick value shows us that to date NHL Scouts have made more successful draft picks the higher they are picking. (McCallum 2018.) As shown in table 3.11 the higher the draft pick, the higher it’s value and also the higher chance that scouts are selecting the better players.

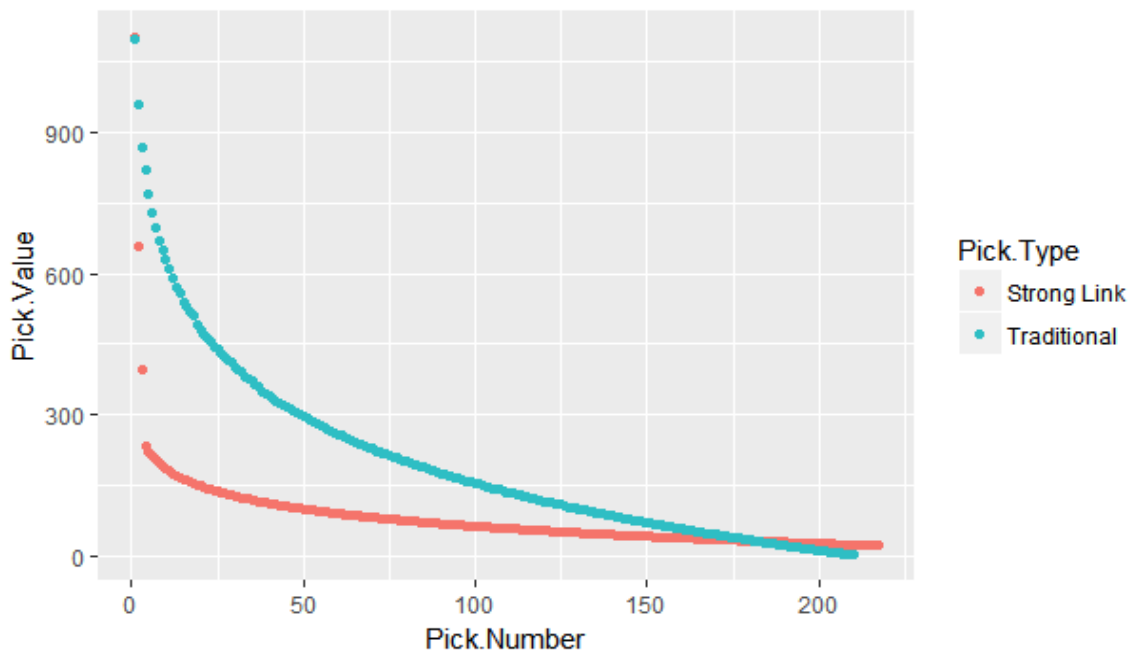

Table 3.11 Chace McCallum's Study comparing 2 different historical NHL Draft Pick Value Charts (2018)

Atkins assumes based on his knowledge of the hockey world, that most of these players start to get heavily scouted by the age of thirteen. Going off of this assumption, by the time these players have reached their respective CHL draft these players have been heavily scouted for two or sometimes three seasons in certain cases. So, are the scouts in the CHL drafting as successfully as their NHL counterparts? In Atkins research he created a grading system to measure the “Highest level achieved by round selected” for the players in the WHL and OHL. (Atkins 2015.) The method was to break up the different levels of hockey a CHL drafted player could reach into five categories: NHL, Elite Pro, Minor Pro, Major Junior, College, or none of the above. Each category was given a respective numerical value of: 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6. For it to be considered that a player reached a certain level, they had to play at least fifty percent of the games in one season

After compiling all of the data, Atkins found the average highest level achieved by round selected for both the WHL and the OHL as shown below in table 3.12. What was discovered is that in each round of the draft players getting drafted to the OHL were reaching higher levels of hockey than their WHL counterparts. Atkins listed the later draft year for the OHL as a possible factor for this (Atkins 2015.)

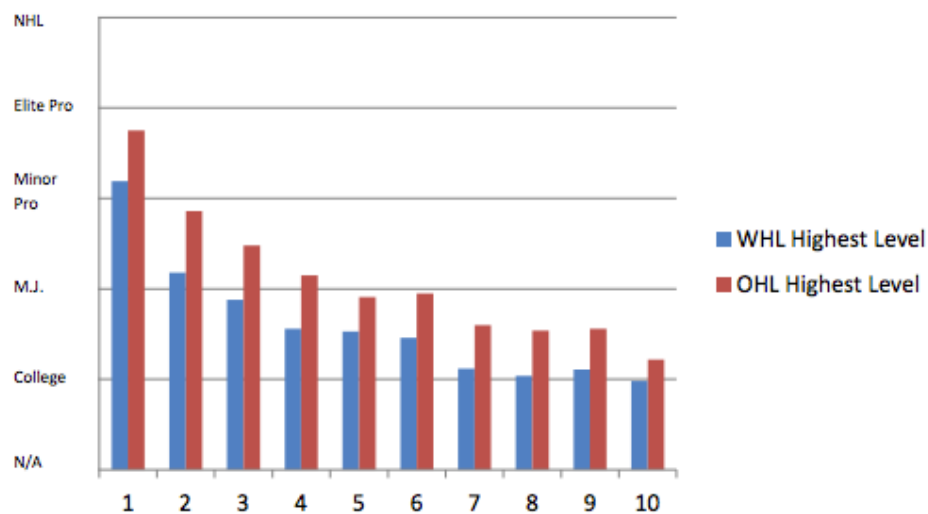

Table 3.12 Atkins figure comparing WHL vs OHL Players highest level achieved by draft round.

The final piece of evidence Atkins uses in his paper, which may play a role in the OHL's draft picks achieving more success, is the bias towards players born earlier in the year. The argument here is that players born during the first quarter of the year (January-March) are more likely to get selected earlier in their drafts because they are older and therefore bigger and stronger than their peers born during the last quarter of the year (October-December). It is possible, for example, that a player born on January 1st is considered in the same age group of a player born on December 31st of same year. That means that even though one player is almost an entire calendar year older than the other they are considered the same age. In the study, Atkins broke down each player's month of birth, and where in the draft they were selected. Then he broke down the calendar into four equal segments to find out how many of the draft picks were born in each quarter of the year. Once Atkins had this data, he was able to take the information of where each player was selected in the draft and find the average round drafted for each quarter of the year. The findings are shown below in table 3.13.

Quartile	WHL			OHL
	N	M	SD	N	M	SD
1	375 (.43)	5.29	2.92	1886 (.42)	7.65	4.31
2	267 (.31)	5.43	2.82	1391 (.31)	8.10	4.30
3	130 (.15)	5.30	2.81	742 (.17)	8.41	4.23
4	91 (.11)	6.30	2.55	444 (.10)	8.17	4.53
Total	863			4463

In this chart Quartile 1 would represent players born in the months January-March, the first quarter of the year. In the WHL 375 players out of the 863-player sample size were born in this quarter, making up 43% of the draft classes. In the OHL 1,886 out of the 4,463-player sample size were born in this quarter, for 42% of the draft classes. With the second quarters of the year both holding down a 31% share of the draft classes that means that 74% of the draft class in the WHL is born in the first half of the year, and the OHL having 73%. Not only are the players born in the early part of the year getting drafted more, but they are getting drafted higher too. The average round drafted for the first quarter in the WHL is 5.29; from there the second to fourth quarters averages are: 5.43, 5.30, and 6.30. By quarter in the OHL the average round selected is: 7.65, 8.10, 8.41, and 8.17. In both the OHL and the WHL the first quarter of the year is hosting the most picks, and the highest average picks. This data proved perfectly the point in Atkins paper that there is a clear bias towards players born earlier in the year in these drafts. This data proves that players in the WHL and OHL are going up against the same bias in the draft that is players born earlier in the year are getting drafted higher because they are often bigger and stronger. What it does not prove is the answers to why OHL drafted players go on to have more successful careers. The extra year of scouting and development before the draft maybe a factor and Atkins suggestion are that “the WHL may want to consider delaying its draft by one year to coincide with the OHL” (Atkins 2015, 36.)

Atkins main question in this study is “whether or not selection order predicted future success as a hockey player”. While looking at the factors of: age bias, and measuring draft picks career success he sought for his answer. What he discovered in his data set was that players born earlier in the year are getting drafted in higher quantity, and earlier in the draft. He also found that, round by round. Picks in the OHL draft were out performing their counterparts in the WHL over their careers. The one different factor that may have an effect on this is the OHL drafting one year later than the WHL. Atkins did not include the quantity and percentage of OHL and WHL players went on to get drafted in the NHL. Although his ranking system measuring the average level reached by round did provide some insight. Another factor that could affect the issue was the number of undrafted players entered the OHL and WHL, and the effect draft age could play on those percentages.

4 Burnout

Significant amounts of studies have been conducted to analyze burnout in athletes. In an early definition, athlete burnout was defined as a psychological, emotional and at times physical withdrawal from a formerly pursued and enjoyable activity, as a result of chronic stress (R. E. Smith, 1986.) Burnout can occur when an athlete goes through the development process, is both emotionally and physically exhausted and the athlete has been unable to cope with the load being presented to them. An example of elite athletes being susceptible to burnout is in the study conducted by Hodge, Lonsdale, Ng (2007.) They analyzed burnout in elite rugby players and their psychological fulfillment, where they separated the athletes into two groups: “high - burnout” players and “low - burnout” players. High burnout players were noted as being more susceptible to burnout and having fewer fulfillments in their psychological needs. Low burnout athletes were not as susceptible to burnout and had a higher fulfillment of their psychological needs in sport. The diversification between the two groups was established by the Athlete Burnout Questionnaire created for this study (Raedeke & Smith, 2001.) The Data created in this study shows truth that athletes with less needs satisfaction and fulfillment are more susceptible to being burnt out in sport and this can be improved by proper coaching. Also, specific training climates for athletes can greatly increase sport involvement and participation and lower burnout (Gagne, Ryan & Bargmann, 2003.)

Although athletes enjoy sport, with the high increasing demands of athletes as they get into the elite stream, the possibility of athletes becoming burnt out and the ability to suffer from chronic stress arises (Schaufeli & Buunk, 2003; R. E. Smith, 1986.) Elite hockey is a demanding sport, especially in The Major Junior. The Major Junior stream contains a lengthy schedule that is filled with games. 72 games in the Western Hockey League, 68 in both the Ontario Hockey League and Quebec Major Junior Hockey League. As of the 2018-2019 Western Hockey League season, The WHL has modeled their season schedule to those of both the OHL and QMJHL with a 68-game schedule. The season schedule is also loaded with on ice practices and off ice workouts. There are significant requirements that need to be met by each individual athlete. Elite hockey players get little time off in the off-season as they must prepare and develop themselves for the upcoming season. It is forever an ongoing discussion that sports at the elite level have turned into a full time and year-round commitment, eliminating any chance for the athletes to take part in any major off season or down time (Weinberg & Gould, 2003.) This study analyzes burnout in competitive and elite athletes, where the psychological, physiological and social aspects of sport can contribute to burnout. As well as commitment and pursuit of success that also has contributing factors. The Major Junior drafting process hopes to create a smooth and easy transition for elite hockey players to further their careers and advance to the next level, however that process may be deemed inappropriate for some. Burnout plays a crucial part in the analysis of the Major Junior drafting process due to the physiological, psychological and social burdens pressed upon athletes in varying age groups; 14-year-old athletes going on 15 years old in the Western Hockey League. 15-year-old athletes going on 16 years old in both the Ontario Hockey League and the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League. The Canadian Hockey League draft can expose athletes to situations they are not ready to cope with. A 14 year old drafted player may not be physically or mentally prepared to take on the responsibilities or demands that are asked of him by the respected club or league until they are 16 years old, Same can apply to those athletes 15 years old going on 16 years old in the OHL and QMJHL potentially increasing their stress level and making them susceptible to burnout. Although the data shown in table 8.11 shows a significantly higher success rate of those athletes in both the Ontario Hockey League and the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League.

To develop and achieve elite status, hockey players must be committed and motivated. Athletes who are highly motivated have increased chances of burnout (Pines, 1993.) Hockey players in the Major Junior stream dream of success and are playing in the league to get something out of the sport of hockey, such as a career, scholarship or to make it in Professional Hockey. Athletes with the mindset that they will succeed proceed through their careers with relentless effort and desire for success. With that “relentlessness” comes ignoring the exhaustion and pushing themselves to the limits in order to develop and succeed. However, those efforts can put athletes on the verge of being burnt out and also could be at risk of serious injury. Athletes that are energetic and committed appear to be the ones most susceptible to burnout, however those that have traits of commitment, desire, drive and resilience appear the most appealing to recruiters, coaches and teammates. The athletes who show the most determination and drive are often put in situations where they can succeed, because they have a mental advantage over everyone else. The mental capacity these athletes possess may enable them to endure tough times, as well as conduct everyday routine and still compete and work. These tools are commodities that are significantly appreciated and looked for amongst coaches and recruiters. When relating to burnout the relentless training and participation the athlete conducts, they can acquire additional physical and mental stresses through exhaustion that can lead towards burnout. “Thus, the great enthusiasm found in many young prospering athletes can develop into a maladaptive attribute and lead to a loss of zeal” (Gustafsson, 2007,17.)

No athlete is the same. Athletes all endure difference experiences and situations that help them grow as both people and athletes. However, there are different stresses that impact every athlete differently. One athlete might endure competition in a different capacity than their opponent. (Gustafsson, 2007.) In hockey not all of the athletes are going to find the same stress points, or endure stress at all. This can be related to the success some athletes have in hockey, and the failure to continue the sport. Some athletes that are drafted in the Canadian Hockey league and do not reach potential can be associated with them facing stressors that inhibit their performance causing underdevelopment and lack of engagement. In a busy world that is Major Junior hockey, athletes may not show their burnout symptoms immediately or at all. It is in the mentality in sport that a burnt-out athlete in the elite stream can be seen negatively and undesirable as it can bring team morale down. Early detection of burnout has been noted as very difficult to Assess, due to the sporting environment having negative outlooks on burnt out athletes (Cresswell & Eklund, 2006a; Gould, Tuffey et al., 1996.)

Burnout can occur to athletes at different points in their lives and careers. Although the extensiveness of burnout is not well known, it plays a significant role in Hockey and the Major Junior Draft. Gustafsson outlines many different factors that can be related to the sport of Hockey and elite level players as they go through the Major Junior system. Physical Loads that increase with age and playing level that can exhaust the athlete, and when their drive exceeds their ability they can inhibit growth as an athlete and as a human being, when placed in an environment that is inappropriate for a player perhaps too young or just not physically prepared for the challenges they may face, those challenges may lead to an early case of burnout. Mental loads on the athletes that bring out their drive and pursuit of success can implement burnout through stress related symptoms (Gustafsson, 2007.) Burnout can be related to Hockey Players as they increase their training loads as they advance in the hockey stream, however some may not be physically or mentally prepared to take on those loads, depleting them of their work ethic shortly after it began. Burnout plays a crucial factor in the development of hockey players and can inhibit chances of success.

5 Early Specialization in Sport

Studies have shown that athletes who specialize in sport too early can suffer from negative outcomes; burnout or sport dropouts are some potential outcomes of participating deliberately in sport at a young age. Intense and deliberate training in one singular sport at a young or, “sampling” age, has been termed ‘early specialization’ (Hill, 1993.) Former studies have documented that early specialization in sport is not the single method to achieve expertise (Carlson, 1988; Hill, 1993; Côté, 1999; Baker et al., 2003.) There is a model that outlines the recommended pathway for specializing athletes (Côté, Vierimaa, 2016.) The Development Model of Sports Participation (DMSP) inhabits three different outcomes of sport participation: (1) elite participation (2) recreational participation and (3) dropout. As well, the DMSP has created four distinct stages within youth age groups: the sampling years (age 6–12), the specializing years (age 13–15), the investment years (age 16) and the recreational years (ages 13). With regards to the Canadian Hockey League drafting processes in the three Major Junior Leagues, two of the three leagues respond accordingly to the DMSP where they are selecting players in the ‘Investment Years’. Whereas in the Western Hockey League players are picked in the ‘specializing years’, a level of participation that is leaning more towards single sport specialization, but is still early and athletes should still be exposed to more sports and aspects of life. By the age of 13, most youth athletes are mentally and physically ready to specialize in one single sport, potentially ensuring up the Western Hockey League’s decision to draft players at 14 years old going on 15. However, investing in one sport requires a few more years of maturity (Patel, Pratt, Greydanus, 2002.) Players that specialize in elite sport at a later age have gone on to more successful and lengthy careers in the sport of hockey.

When associating single sport athletes and their successes (Tiger Woods of the PGA and Jonathan Toews of the NHL) it has been shown that there can indeed be positive outcomes to early specialization. However, Wiersma (2000) hypothesized that the isolation of skills in youth sport specialization could lead to limited or lack of motor skill development. Eventually causing long-term negative effects that could inhibit participation and any involvement in different activities for the athlete. Specialization in sport can isolate an athlete as a human and can negate growth. When a young child specializes in sport, the effects can be magnified since the child endures both external and internal factors, puberty leads that list of factors. Diversification is heavily encouraged through exposure to a vast amount of experiences and the ability to develop different skills and social abilities not found in one single sport. Through long term diversification the athlete is able to take all skills learned and apply them to many different sports. The social, physical or mental skills learned from all sports can be continued and applied to the single sport the athlete may choose in the future. In other terms, the crossover effect can take place here and contribute to athletic performance. Wall and Côté (2007) analyzed developmental activities that lead to dropout and investment in sport with a focus on specialization. The purpose of their study was to discover the amount of early diversification in youth and whether that played an influence in the athlete's decision to drop out of sport. The participants involved in his study were the parents of the athletes divided into two groups, an "active group" where the parents' children were still involved in the sport of hockey. And a "dropout group" where the parent's children were recently removed from the sport. Wall and Côté analyzed the athlete's involvement in sport in an eight-year analysis of the player's progress through the youth hockey system. They used statistics to report what age the "active" and "dropout" groups began participating in hockey as well as other sports, and the number of hours spent within each. The study concluded that both active and dropout players were introduced to sport diversely and experienced enjoyment. The early stages and introduction to hockey were seen to be similar amongst the two groups in terms of time spent playing and practicing. However, the study showed that the dropout players in this study were found to have started off-ice training at a younger age, investing much more time per year in training at 12 or 13 years old. Showing that training at a younger age may have negative effects in long-term sport participation. With how the WHL Draft is established, athletes are getting selected earlier than the athletes in the eastern part of Canada and select states in the United States of America, forcing athletes to train earlier, impeding the development process and putting emphasis on performance and training. Based on Wall and Côté's study of sport participation; it can be concluded that the extra year both the Ontario Hockey League and Quebec Major Junior Hockey League have may be incredibly beneficial to athletes that decide to specialize and train specifically to hockey. That extra year of development increases physical, mental and social maturity enabling the athlete to take on a larger workload and additional stresses that they are now ready to handle. Wall and Côté discovered in their study that the mean age of the athletes who dropped out of hockey was 14.5 in comparison to the average age of the athletes in the "active group" of 13.9. This discovery leads them to an idea that human functionality and development may have influenced dropout, as opposed to their participation in sport. Human functionality and development can be associated with puberty, maturation and the ability to deal with training loads physically, mentally and socially. To support this discovery, with recognition of the Canadian Hockey League; OHL and QMJHL players are given more time past Wall and Côté's established "Dropout age" and can take additional time to specialize and partake in appropriate training and sporting protocols that will decrease the chances of dropout. Also, with the added timeframe they are able to diversify their skill set and increase enjoyment in various sports as well as their future sport of choice (Wall and Côté 2007.)

6 Research Aims and Questions

The purpose of this study is to outline the differentiation of success of drafting and developing Professional Hockey Players amongst the three leagues in the CHL. One of the aims of this study was to prove that both the OHL and QMJHL would have a higher rate of developing professional players than the WHL, and to investigate some possible factors as to why being drafted at a younger age has a negative effect. Through the study it was confirmed that the WHL is having a significantly lower level of success than its counterparts, but another aim of the study was to look into possible factors as to why drafting younger players was hurting their development. Finding out through the research that specializing in one sport too early can negatively hurt an athlete's development and lead them to burning out early could help build a case for the WHL to consider moving the draft age back. Changing their draft to be in line with the rest of the CHL would be a good change for the development of the league.

One problem that was encountered in the study, was a truly determining player progression and development. The only data available to measure the success a player was having was how many games they played, points, and highest playing level reached. Development was measured as either moving up a level year to year, or putting up more points at the same level the following year. Not all players are measured on their offensive production, and just valuing a player by points is not the most accurate measurement tool. It would be difficult though to get more advanced evaluation on a sample size this large, with players on a mass number of teams, over such a long sample period. The study also does not account for which players fell into the category of early specialization, but just assumes that a larger number of players in the AMHL would have been because of those players being exposed to an earlier drafting experience.

7.1 Data Collection

For this study, the following leagues were analyzed for player success rates; The Alberta Midget Hockey League (AMHL), The Greater Toronto Minor Midget Hockey League (GTMMHL) and Quebec Midget AAA Hockey League (QMAAA). The leagues were deemed as the highest level of performance each player analyzed could have been playing in at the time for the data set. For the WHL, Alberta was deemed as the subsection we wished to use for our study because of our confidence level and familiarity with that league. Whereas the GTMMHL produced the most players in the OHL draft and QMAAA was the only league for elite players to play in inside the province of Quebec. The players analyzed in Alberta are fifteen years old immediately following their year of Eligibility for the WHL Bantam Draft. Alberta players are noted as both Drafted and Undrafted Players. In the GTMMHL and QMAAA the players are fifteen years old and been selected in their Midget Drafts from their respective leagues. QMAAA players selected as a 16-year-old over ager were not included in this study. For the length and continuity of the study, Players were followed from their initial playing age of fifteen to their final year of junior eligibility at age twenty.

7.2 Statistical Analysis

After researching the drafts in the WHL, OHL and QMJHL, the lengths of each athlete's playing career and path through the hockey stream were analyzed. The data has been summarized and broken down into the following categories:

- Number and percentage of players who play in The CHL.
- Number and percentage of players drafted into the NHL.
- Number and percentage of players who play NHL games and number of NHL games.
- Number and percentage of players who play until twenty years of age.
- Number and percentage of players who play NCAA.
- Number and percentage of players who play USsports*.
- Number and percentage of CHL Players who were undrafted in the CHL, but made rosters as list players.

Players born between the years 1991 and 1995 were used in this study to establish a five-year timeline amongst all three respective leagues. This age range was established due to the beginning of this study coinciding with the 1995 age group coming to the end of their junior eligibility. 630 Hockey players amongst the leagues were researched. In total, 194 Hockey Players from the AMHL, 181 from the GTMMHL and 255 from the QMAAA. With these numbers, the parameters were outlined and an appropriate sample size was created to develop an understanding of each leagues success rates. A large sample size broadens the range of possible data and forms a better picture for analysis (P. Depaulo, 2000). The success rates of each league were broken down to analyze the number of players who were drafted to the NHL and those who accumulated NHL games played. Percentages were established for players who pursued the CHL route as well as athletes who fulfilled their entire junior career to the age of 20. For players that did not pursue the CHL route and instead went to play collegiate hockey; data was compiled to determine how many players went the NCAA route in the sample size that was created. Another way for athletes to enter the CHL without being drafted is by having their Major Junior rights listed by a club. The Player protected list is used by the WHL to ensure there is an orderly method for WHL Clubs to access the playing rights to players (<http://prospects.whl.ca/prospect-central-whl-club-protected-player-lists/>.) Players can be placed on a protected list through both drafting and listing processes. In this study the numbers and percentages of listed players inside our sample size have been documented and established. Player information and draft status was researched through various web-based player databases and draft sites. Over the five-year span of each athlete's career, progression and regression was discovered in the following categories; Team played for, league the team resided, number of games played and points. Progression of a player's career would be defined as a specific player moving from one level of play to a higher level the following season, or by increasing their output in the same league as the previous season. Regression in this situation would be defined as a player's inability to produce at the same level as the year before, or their failure to stay in the CHL and have to go play in a lower level league. At the end of the five-year timeline, the charts also disclose whether the athlete continued to play hockey past their junior eligible age of 20 years old. The procedure conducted in this study exposes all results of the athletes studied and produces percentages and success rated throughout their playing careers.

8 Results

8.1 Summary

Inside the sample set, the variables that were sought out were percentages of players who were drafted to the NHL and players who had accumulated NHL games. Also studied was the breakdown of rosters whether players went undrafted and listed at a later date to play for their respected clubs. Also researched were players who chose another direction as opposed to the Major Junior route and pursued collegiate hockey (NCAA). This research was used to determine another outlet for players to continue their careers another way than Major Junior. Simply put, not all elite hockey players pursue the Major Junior route and can be exposed to different streams that can help them advance to the highest level of performance, the NHL. The three charts used to break down the sample size and establish percentages and overall parameters are as follows:

- Total Sample size and their successes from the three Major Junior Leagues.
- Total Amount of Listed or Undrafted players and their successes amongst the three Major Junior Leagues.
- Total amount of players that pursued the NCAA Route as opposed to Major Junior hockey and their successes from the three Major Junior Leagues.

In table 8.11 the differentiation of success amongst leagues is displayed. In the GTMMHL the percentage of players drafted to the NHL is significantly higher than the other leagues, with 32.04% of the players getting drafted. 39 Players were able to play NHL games producing a total of 3,920 games over the five-year study. In the QMAAA the percentage of players drafted to the NHL came second to the OHL, with 21.96% of the players being selected. 18 players played NHL games and accumulated a total of 1,575 NHL games played. The AMHL came third of the three leagues studied. The percentage of players drafted to the NHL was 21.13%. A total of 10 Players played NHL games and reached a grand total of 308 NHL games played.

In table 4.12 the successes of listed players making their respective Major Junior Leagues was analyzed. Listed players are those that are undrafted in their priority selection drafts and are added to the protected lists at a later date. The contingent for players to be included in this study as a listed player, skaters must have participated in at least 35 games and goalies must have started in at least 15 games. These numbers were calculated as half the amount of regular season games or the mandatory amount of games played for athletes to lose their "rookie" status. Over the five-year study, the Western Hockey League accumulated the most listed players to become full time players with 24.03% of all players in the league. The Quebec Major Junior Hockey league was second amongst percentages with 9.7% of all players entering the league as listed players. The Ontario Hockey League had the least number of listed players as 5.13% of all OHL rosters were made up of non-drafted players, while 94.87% of OHL rosters were drafted players.

Table 8.13 implements the analysis of players choosing the NCAA route and foregoing the Major Junior route regardless of their draft status. Although a significantly smaller result than the other charts, this plays an important role in the study, as there are multiple pathways an athlete can pursue to achieve and continue their athletic careers. Over the five-year span, The GTMMHL had the highest percentage of collegiate level players as 14.36% of athletes went NCAA. The AMHL came secondary with 5.37% of studied athletes went to college. QMAAA produced the least amount of college athletes with a total of 1.96% of athletes electing to go NCAA.

8.2 GTMMHL

The sample size of the GTMMHL is composed of players who were playing in the GTMMHL at 15 years old and were selected in the Ontario Hockey League priority selection draft. A total of 175 hockey players from the GTMMHL were studied in this sample size over the five-year timeline. Because of this guideline, all 175 studied hockey players were drafted to the OHL.

Table 8.21. Breakdown of where GTMMHL players played and their production.

Of the 175 players that were drafted to The OHL from the GTMMHL, 118 players played in the CHL. The total amount of games played was 22,832, averaging 193.49 games per player. When analyzing the 193.49 games played per player, the average player had a career length of 2.85 seasons in the Ontario Hockey League. Point production was analyzed and over the five-year time line, the total amount of points produced in the CHL was 13,995 points. Each player in the OHL averaged 118.60 points in their OHL careers.

After playing in the OHL, Professional outcomes were observed before turning 20 years old. 42 of the 175 players played games in the American Hockey League. 2,201 American Hockey League games were played amongst the 42 players. The average amount of AHL games played per player was 52.40. From a production standpoint a total of 1,045 points was accumulated amongst all players. Divided amongst all players to have played in The American Hockey League, the average amount of points was player was 24.88.

55 of the 175 GTMMHL players were drafted to The National Hockey League. 20 of the 55 players played NHL games before the age of 20. Meanwhile the other 35 had not yet played NHL games before turning 20 years old. The 20 players reached a total of 1,323 NHL games played averaging 66.15 games per player. Following the NHL's 82 game Regular Season schedule, those 66.15 games are 15.85 games short of a full season in the National Hockey League. 600 total points were accumulated amongst the 20 NHL players, averaging 30 points per player.

In the five-year and 175-player sample size, a total of 39 players became NHL players. From the 20 that played before the age of 20, 19 additional players made NHL rosters at the age of 20 years old. These players accumulated a total of 3,918 NHL games played. Between the 39 athletes, they averaged 100.46 Games played by the time the five-year analysis was completed. The players totalled 1,960 Points, bringing the total average of NHL points per player to 50.26.

The GTMMHL is identified as the league to have produced the most AHL and NHL players in comparison to the AMHL and the QMAAA inside this studies parameter.

8.3 QMAAA

The QMAAA sample size was modeled similarly to the GTMMHL, 15-year-old players who were drafted to the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League. A total of 226 Hockey players were studied over the five-year timeline. Based on the parameters and similarity to the GTMMHL, all 226 hockey players were drafted to the QMJHL.

Table 8.31 Breakdown of where QMAAA players played and their production.

A total of 226 players were drafted to the QMJHL. 207 of the 226 players played in the QMJHL, accumulating a total of 37,388 QMJHL games played. The average amount of games played for each QMJHL player was 180.62 games played. The average career length of hockey players in the QMJHL was 2.66 seasons. Point production in the QMJHL was analyzed. Of the 207 players, 18,662 points were accumulated during this timeline. An average point production through their careers was assessed, determining each player had accumulated 90.15 points.

Before turning 20 years old, 39 QMAAA players had played games in the American Hockey League. These 39 players had reached 1,703 AHL games played, each player achieving an average of 43.67 games played before the age of 20. Productivity at the AHL was noted as all 39 players accumulating a total of 501 points. The average of points per player was noted at 12.85 points in their early AHL careers.

47 of the 226 QMAAA players were drafted to the National Hockey League, 10 of which had become NHL players before the age of 20 years old. These 10 players accumulated a total of 390 games played at the NHL level, averaging 39 games played per player. Following the NHL's 82 game Regular Season schedule, the average of 39 games played per player was 43 games short of a full Regular season per player. Amongst the 10 players in the NHL before the age of 20, a total of 168 points were accumulated. Averaging 16.8 points per player in their early NHL careers.

Over the five-year timeline of the QMAAA, 16 of the 226 hockey players reached the NHL. 16 total players to play in the NHL is an increase of six players from the 10 who played in the NHL before turning 20-years old. These athletes accumulated 1,287 games played, averaging 80.44 games per player. These 16 NHL players accumulated a total of 441 points in the NHL, establishing a total average of 27.56 points per player at the National Hockey League at the completion of this study.

The QMAAA has been identified as the league to produce the second most AHL and NHL athletes in comparison to The GTMMHL and the AMHL.

8.4 AMHL

The sample size for the WHL consists of players who played in the AMHL at age 15. The range of the sample size was players born between 1991 and 1995. There was a total of 179 players from Alberta that fit into the parameters of the study.

Table 8.41. Breakdown of where AMHL players played and their production.

Of the 179 players in Alberta who played in the AMHL at age 15, 142 were selected in the WHL draft. Out of those drafted, 129 played CHL games; 90.85% of the drafted players. Over the time of the study this group amassed a total of 25,736 games played, and scored 12,731 points. The average CHL career for those that played games in the WHL was 199.5 games played, and 98.69 points per player.

31 out of the 179 AMHL players went on to play professionally in the AHL while still fitting in the studies parameters. These 31 players totalled 1,243 games played and scored 377 points over the time of the study. That's an average of 40.1 games played and 12.16 points scored per player.

Only 41 of the 179 AMHL players were drafted to the NHL (22.91% of sample), and 4 of them played NHL games while still in the age range of the study. These players totalled 34 NHL games and scored 6 points while still 20 years of age or younger. Averaging 8.5 games played and 1.5 points for per player during this time.

Looking at players NHL totals even after the age of 20, had 10 out of the 179 AMHL players play an NHL game. This group totalled 328 games played and scored 68 points. That is an average of 32.8 games, and 6.8 points per player in the NHL.

9 Discussion

This study conducted an analysis of the success rates of the Major Junior drafting process. What was found was the differentiation of success toward producing elite level athletes and advancing them to higher levels amongst the WHL, OHL and QMJHL. With comparison to the studies included in the literature reviews on sport participation and burnout, the OHL and QMJHL coincide with the recommended level of involvement in sport and show the benefits by producing the highest numbers of elite level hockey players. Whereas the WHL implies sport participation on players at an inappropriate age, and have statistically produced fewer elite players that advanced their careers to the next level. The WHL having their draft a year earlier than the other leagues pressures players in the WHL region to sport specialize earlier than the other leagues. Because they are getting drafted at a younger age, these players and their parents are dedicating more time at a younger age to training and specializing in one sport, hockey. This study concluded that the two Major Junior Leagues that draft players after their 15-year old season are having more success in establishing CHL players and also producing NHL players.

The comparison of the three major junior leagues and their successes was crucial to this study not only through player advancement, but also the make-up of the Major Junior team's rosters. A large number of Western Hockey League rosters are made up of listed players who went undrafted and were added at a later date (24.03% of all rosters in the WHL.) With such a small make-up of undrafted or "listed" players in the OHL and QMJHL (5.13% and 9.7% respectively) it is very intriguing to wonder if the drafting method is appropriate since WHL clubs are adding a large number of players to their rosters that they would have scouted and found after the WHL Draft.

Curtis Atkinson released a similar study in 2015 when he published Predicting Hockey Success: The Western Hockey League Bantam Draft and Ontario Hockey League Priority Selection. He explored "the relations between player size, birthdate and selection order in WHL and OHL drafts and whether or not selection order predicted future success as a hockey player". It was concluded that players who were: born earlier in the year, and heavier (WHL & OHL), and taller (WHL) were selected earlier in the draft. Also, he confirmed that players selected earlier in each draft were more likely to achieve a higher level of success. The one finding Atkinson had that relates to the present study is that he also found that players drafted to the OHL were more likely to play at a higher level over players in the WHL. For alternative purposes in this study, The WHL could have that additional year after their draft solely dedicated to the recruiting and helping the athlete with the transition into the league as the Western Hockey League takes up more of a geographical area than both the OHL and QMJHL.

In this study certain limitations were found, one of those was the decision on the five-year sample size. This five-year sample could be stretched to 1990 birth years and older or 1996 birth years and younger to establish a much longer timeline and could potentially see different results. A measurement tool could have been used similar to Atkinson (2015) where career success was analyzed in more leagues as opposed to just the NHL to determine career success. As opposed to using just the three development leagues in this study (AMHL, GTMMHL and QMAAA) the entire draft class could have been analyzed, covering a magnitude of leagues from across Canada and the United States of America, this could potentially differ the end result. However, the leagues studied narrow the focus to singular development leagues, narrowing the topic and deterring from the study becoming too broad.

Future research that could be applied to this study is the total breakdown of all Canadian Hockey League drafts through time. The study of trends year-by-year in Major Junior and getting an overall image of each league's drafting throughout the league's history, and determining an overall picture as opposed to a five-year timeline. Extensive further research could also take this type of study deeper and start to measure CHL development success on a team-by-team basis. Comparing the success rates of developing professional hockey players for each team in the CHL, not just looking at the success rates of the leagues as a whole. This would provide further insight into different drafting and development models, while also comparing how CHL franchises are measuring up to each other producing NHL players.

10 Conclusion

Although the Major Junior Leagues in the CHL have different drafting methods, (The Western Hockey League drafting one year earlier than both the Ontario Hockey League and The Quebec Major Junior Hockey League) the results and differentiation of success are apparent. This research-based thesis conducted an analysis amongst three different development leagues (AMHL, GTMMHL, QMAAA) that help compose and make up the rosters of all three Major Junior leagues. This study established that players who were at the age of 15-years old going into their 16-year old junior eligible season were found to have the most success and had the ability to further their playing careers beyond what the Western Hockey League was able to produce inside the five-year analysis. The difference was 3,612 NHL games played between the Alberta Midget Hockey League (Western Hockey League Region) and the Greater Toronto Minor Midget Hockey League (Ontario Hockey League Region).

Scouting plays a large role in the process of recruiting a player and establishing that said player would be the right fit for an organization but also has the right tools to become a professional athlete and further their careers beyond the Major Junior ranks. However, from the analysis conducted in this study, both the OHL and The QMJHL have much more success in producing and developing players to the next level. This can be attributed to the ability to draft a player on the brink of their first season of Junior Hockey leading the OHL and QMJHL to have a better grasp of the player they are about to bring into their organization. The Western Hockey League follows a model of drafting players that could eventually deter players from pursuing an athletic career. This drafting process brings forth significant risk of players withdrawing from sport from inappropriate environments for the athlete. To allow for all athletes in the Major Junior Leagues to have the most success in advancement and proper development, the governing bodies should inquire on modelling the similar drafting processes all across the country simply due to the significant divide of successes amongst all three leagues. The conclusions from the data taken in this study are that the Major Junior Leagues who draft 16-year-old athletes (OHL, QMJHL) have more success filling their rosters with CHL drafted players, and developing future NHL players than the Major Junior League that drafts 15-year-old athletes (WHL).
